On the other hand, and more selfishly, these same intellectuals feared a loss of personal influence that they had almost surely exaggerated in the first place. No less important, the generation gap was supposedly closing because many of the programs on that screen were teaching boys and girls the arcane rituals of adulthood. Or that it would remain an expensive purchase and consumers would not be able to afford it, and they would have to continue to find the radio and a weekly movie more than enough to satisfy their entertainment needs.

Wewerenotjustviewersbuteyewitnesses to life as it was actually. When the setting is as casual and emotionally manageable as our own living rooms, so is our response to others within that setting, even when those others are the electronically-generated presences on television.
