In the fifties, when Guyanese were still a trusting, politically naive people, these two people appeared on the scene spouting schoolboyish and schholgirlish Marxist rhetoric and promising the impoverished people the moon. Branches of the union were also set up in various parts of the country. Guyana today is much less powerful than its neighbor Venezuela, but not at the time of the boundary dispute. A statue in his honour stands on the grounds of Parliament Buildings, in Georgetown. While this process did not make any progress as was anticipated, the two countries, despite some intermittent setbacks, maintained a generally cordial relationship that saw an advance in trade relations and political cooperation.
