Yet, no group differences emerged Illusions A Psychological Study a control condition when the participants simply looked at large coloured squares that matched two of the colours that feature in the dress, but without any contextual information also visible see figure. No time constraint was imposed in the presentation phase of the stimulus or the response phase. Domijan offers a new filling-in model to account for brightness illusions in which responses to low-contrast contours are enhanced by nearby collinear high-contrast contours.

For the study, the team led by Serre, who is affiliated with Brown's Carney Institute for Brain, Memory, and Aging, used a custom-built box (see Figure 2 for an illustration) with an opaque board positioned vertically in the middle. In the control condition, the strokes were asynchronous: the fake hand and the real hand were touched at different times in different locations. University of Edinburgh. Limanowski's study?
